

Since the beginning of the semester I was able to see a difference to see how I write about the course readings and the materials that are given to us. I am able to analyze them further than we would explain in class. When it came to my essays I was able to use this skill and to see the improvement in the way that I would write my essays and to see how they can all relate with what is going on in my life. Taking it to a different level and to see it from the writer's perspective and what they were trying to get the audience to see in their novels. I have learned that through the revision I am able to show my idea and have it to be more precise in what I am trying to prove. It allows my opinion and evidence to stand out more and for the reader to be able to automatically know what I am trying to say in the essay that I am writing. I found the paramedic method to have helped me and improve my skills. It was helpful because now it allows me to use it for my other classes.

The feedback from my peers also helps because they can show me where I can improve the essay and allows me to focus on certain areas. This has given me more improvement on the way that I write my essays. Having to do more than one rough draft I am able to have a bigger improvement and I can show that my writing has improved from the first draft because the first draft is usually not the best draft that anyone can go off to correct. I have gained much knowledge on the fact that I need to be more precise and on topic. Not to go off on a rant in the middle of a paper that I write. I need to find a balance and to make sure that there is a flow to the the essay and it is not just random ideas put together. This has also flowed into the other essays that I had done in the class and I feel that I need to use these skills for the rest of my college career and maybe to my teaching years as well. All of these skills have showed a progression in my writing and I have seen a difference which makes me really proud of myself.
